

Creator Crossover and Niche Audience Overlap

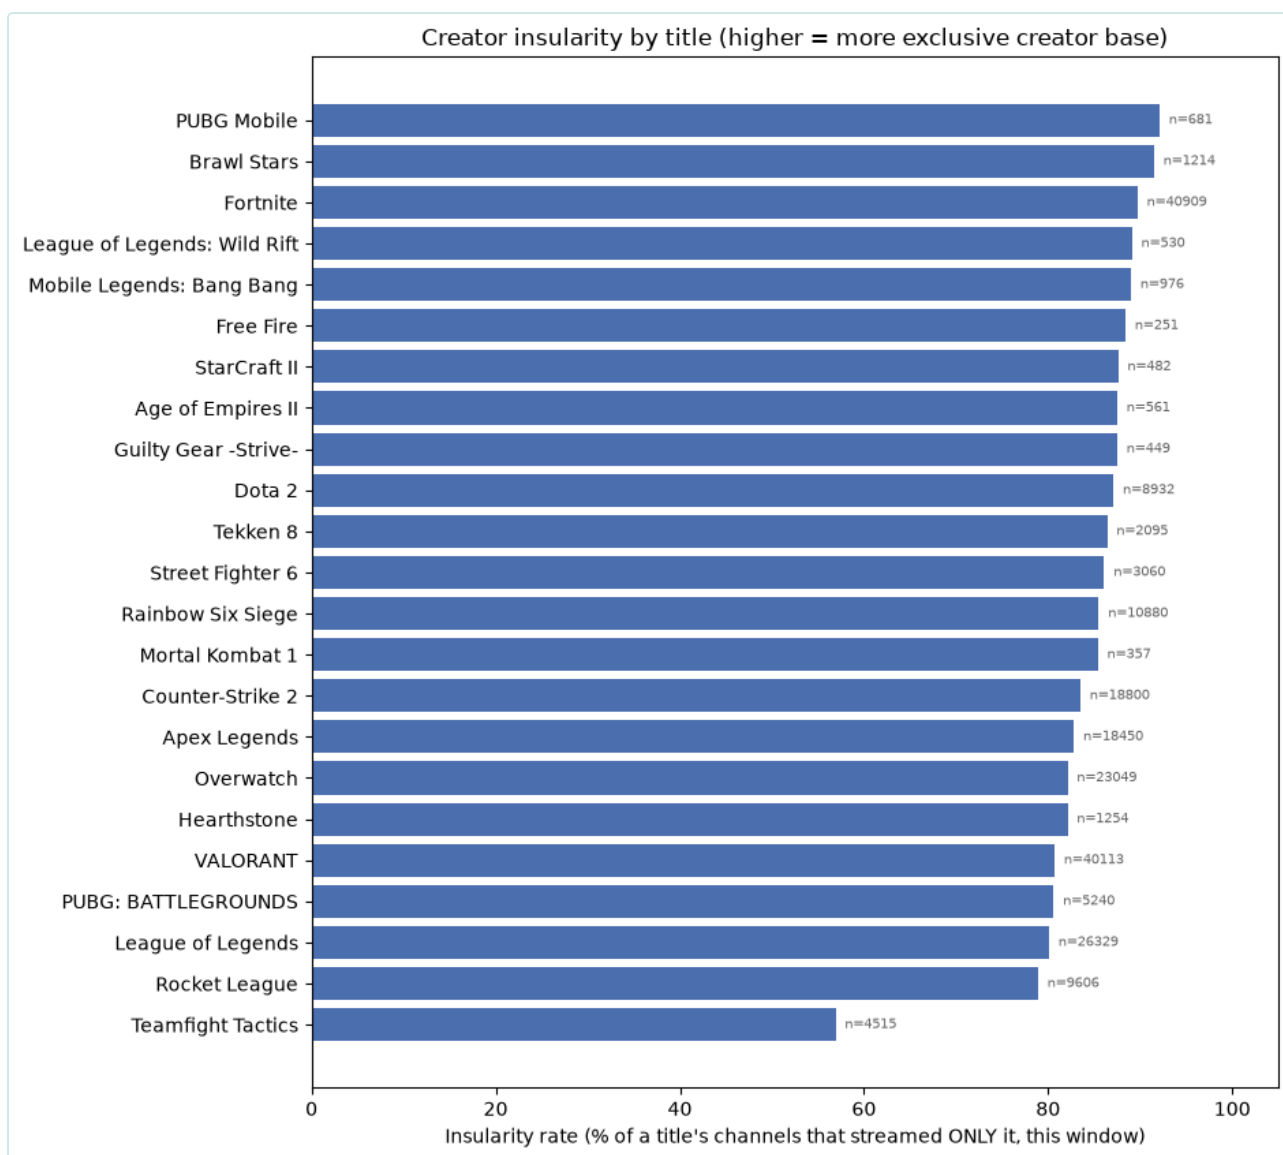

16 September 2026

This is a snapshot of two pieces of work in progress from an independent research project tracking audience and creator-ecosystem behavior across 23 competitive-gaming titles, combining self-collected live Twitch measurement with Liquipedia's own tournament records. Sharing it now, alongside the access request for the titles above, as a concrete example of the kind of question this data is being used to answer.

Both pieces below cover a single, fairly short measurement window (a few days to two weeks), and are shown here as directional early findings, not settled conclusions — the honest caveats are kept in, not smoothed over.

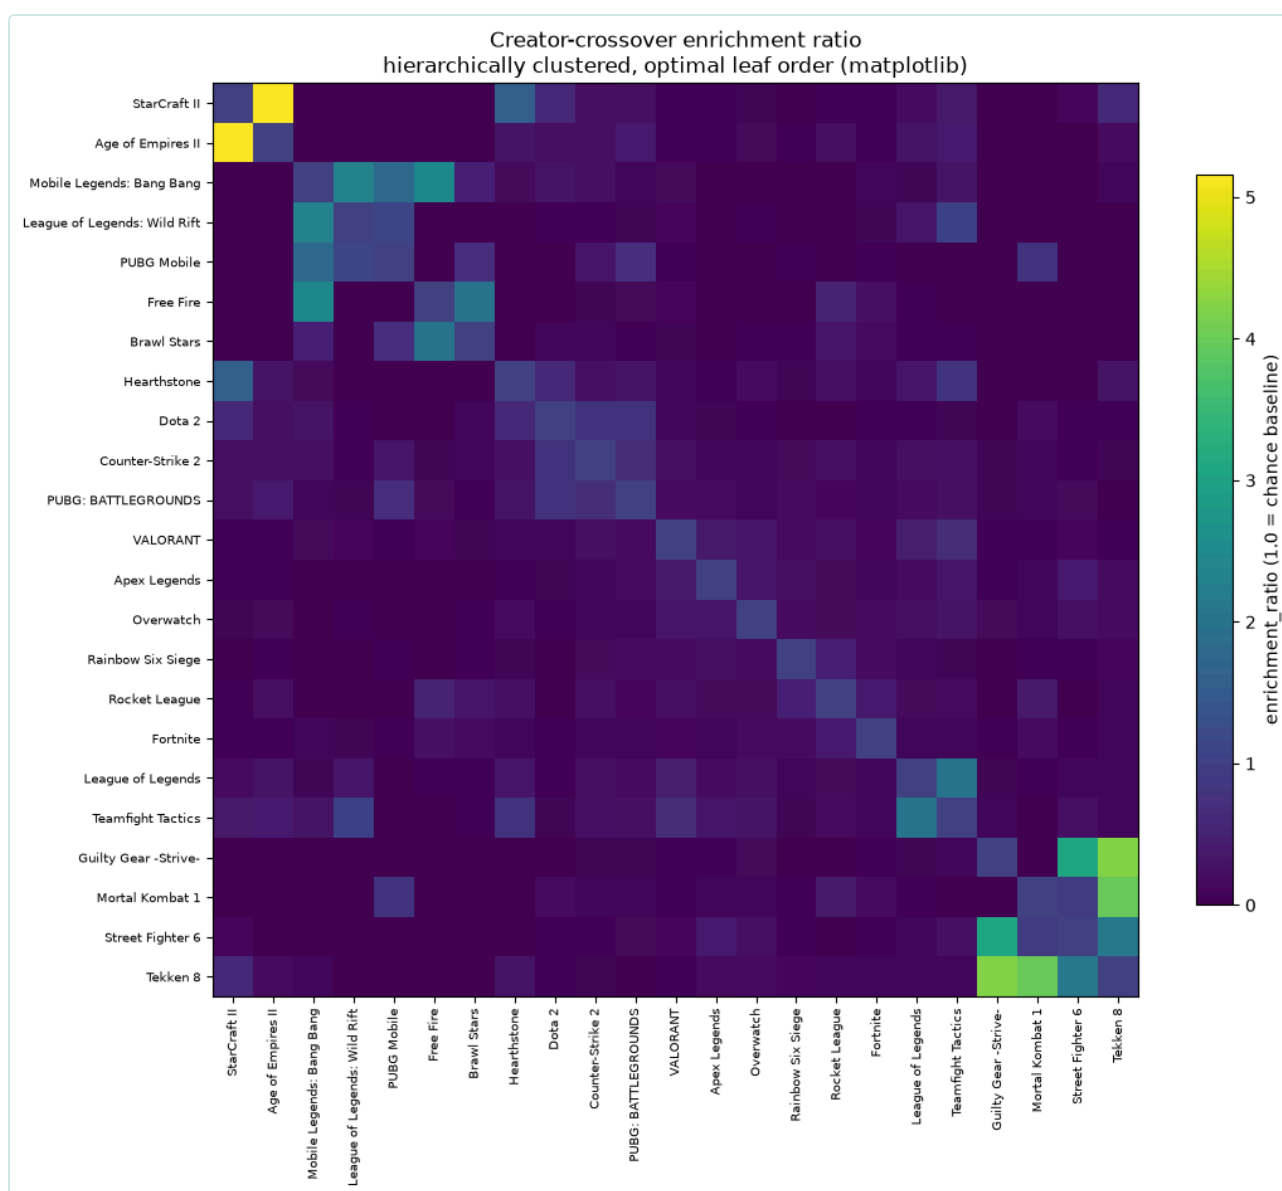

Do creators specialize, or cross over between titles?

Across all 23 tracked titles, creators overwhelmingly stick to one title. Even the title with the most crossover in this window — Teamfight Tactics, at 56.9% — still saw a majority of its creators stream nothing else above a basic viewership threshold. Most titles sit far higher: several mobile and strategy titles show 87–92% of their creators exclusive to that one title alone.

Distinct creators per title who streamed only that title, this window (raw creator counts shown alongside each bar).

Raw overlap counts are misleading on their own — two very large titles will share a lot of creators purely because both pools are enormous, without any real affinity implied. So every pair below is also scored against what two titles of their specific sizes would share by pure chance (an enrichment ratio: 1.0× means exactly the chance level, higher means creators are moving between these two titles more than random chance would predict).

Every title-pair's enrichment ratio, titles reordered so similar pairs sit near each other. Two clear blocks stand out: the fighting-game titles, and the mobile MOBA/battle-royale titles — both far more internally connected than anything else in the set.

The full pairwise table below (190 title pairs with at least one shared creator this window) is sorted by enrichment ratio, highest first:

Do titles that share a genre and platform actually share an audience?

A separate question: when two titles occupy the same competitive niche (same genre, same primary platform), do they draw from the same pool of viewers, or does the audience actually split between them? Measured here via each title's language mix on Twitch — how similar are two titles' audiences once the one language almost every title has some of (English) is set aside, since it otherwise masks real differences in the rest of the audience.

Thirteen same-niche pairs exist across the 23 tracked titles. Most aren't reliably readable this window, for two different honest reasons: some titles' Twitch creator base is currently too thin to trust (mobile titles, mainly), and some have a live tournament running during this exact measurement window, which pulls their audience's apparent makeup toward that broadcast rather than reflecting the title's normal audience.

Of the pairs that are cleanly readable, one result stands out: Apex Legends and PUBG: BATTLEGROUNDS — both battle royale titles on PC/console — show the strongest audience similarity of any clean pair in the table, on two independent measures agreeing with each other. In the same niche, Apex Legends and Fortnite show the opposite: the least similar audience of the entire table. Same genre, same platform, very different audience makeup depending on the specific pair.
